Phone call in office

basement (self.Paranormal)

submitted 2 months ago by SlowStudy

I used to work in a hotel as a security guard. The building was build in 1922 and it had a basement. One night, the front desk clerk, the vallet, and I are just hanging out in the lobby just chatting when a phone ring. The phone call was coming from the basement where office are. At that time, there are supposed to be noone in the basement office. I already locked the doors and make sure that no one is in there. The front desk pick up the phone heard a weird noise and got disconnected.

It gives me chill to the bones. The valet guy and I went down to make sure that no one didn't trespass. The doors are still locked and didn't see anyone coming out so we went inside the office. The only thing we found is the phone blinking and looks like someone pick it up and drop it. The valet and I look at each other ans seen the cold sweat on our faces. That is one of creepiest thing that happened to me went working as a graveyard security.

not sure what the conditions were at the time but the phone being in a basement could point to debunking something. certain landline phones can dial randomly or trip a certain function if water somehow gets in the wiring. i don't know specifically how it works, but i had a time years ago where i woke in the middle of the night to a police officer banging on my door and several more making a perimeter around my house. apparently water interference in the phone line had caused my phone to dial and hang up on 911 several times in a row.

Do they have to press a button to call the front desk from that phone, or does it automatically call?

Pressing A button now, sir

That's very weird. Either way would have been strange, but that seems intentional.
