Debunk This Frost Appearing Inside Recently Deceased Grandmother's Bedroom (self.Paranormal)

Premise: My grandmother passed away last week and I flew to India from the U.S. to attend the last rites (we are Hindu). We kept her in a freezer casket (for 3 days) in the mortuary and then brought the freezer to the hall of her house the morning we arrived. After the cremation, we cleared the bed and other furniture from her bedroom and buried a rock there to symbolize the burial of her corporeal body.

The priest told us that no one was to enter the room except for when my dad, uncle, my mom, and aunt were performing the rituals, because her spirit was supposedly still roaming in there. After staying there for one night, I left to go stay at my aunt's place so the following was my parents' and uncle and aunt's account of what happened:

My parents stayed there, went to check inside the room in the morning at around 8:00, and saw nothing. About an hour later, when my aunt and uncle arrived, they all went inside to start the rituals for the day and found FROST all over the floor. The temperature is around 80 degrees Fahrenheit here. It is HOT. Also, we kept a clay container of water inside the room and outside, and the water outside the room was half emptied (granted, it was a clay pot so it might have absorbed the water).

We have already considered the following scientific possibilities:

The window has been closed for months so moisture or rainwater did not enter through there.

The AC was not on.

The frozen casket was never in that room so it was not from that.

There was no water on the ground.

The supernatural explanation that the priest gave us:

He said he had seen many occurrences like this and said that this was because the water we placed wasn't enough for my grandma's spirit. Apparently, spirits reflect on their unfulfilled desires during this time and just have a lot of desires in general. That is why we give it food and water everyday and a huge platter of food on the last day of the rituals to send it off satisfied. Rebirth is not considered a good thing in Hinduism so we convince the spirit through chants and food offerings that it has nothing left to desire and should pass on and achieve "Moksha." The next day, they increased the amount of water, and the frost only appeared in three spots on the ground. Then, more water was given and the frost completely disappeared.

Side Note: I really question whether the frost appeared in an hour—my parents could have just missed it as they had just woken up. My mom also said the frost was in the form of my grandma, but this also can just be her imagination. There was also a plate and ladle under a bed (my grandmother usually keep silverware under places but apparently it was not in that particular place before according to her caretaker). Displaced objects and temperature drops were cited as common signs of ghosts in several websites.

Also, I DID NOT believe in anything supernatural a week ago, and I actually thought the frost was probably dust or was just a small appearance of ice on the wall or something. BUT, I have photo evidence of the frost after which, I could not deny it.

My mind still refuses to accept this as a supernatural occurrence. I have consulted my cousin who has a master's in chemistry and many others, but no one could give an explanation. If you have seen ANYTHING like this anywhere please post about it. The rational part of me really needs to debunk this to find some peace of mind.
